Our theory of volunteer work is based on several premises. (1) Volunteer work is a productive activity . It is much like any other form of work (paid or unpaid), rather than a simple act of consumption or a leisure time pursuit with purely expressive goals. Many volunteers (e.g., firefighters) eventually become paid employees

(Pearce 1993:35).

A theory of the major mechanisms that sustain and reproduce systems of gender stratification is presented. The central support mechanism is the gender division of labor, within both the family and the wider society. Because of it, men gain superior resource and definitional power, which enable them to maintain the gender status quo regardless of women's wishes.
